Dillon W. Hausauer is an engaging communicator, speaker and preacher who empowers and supports people to make a difference wherever they are. Passionate about helping individuals, particularly those living with pain or suffering, she shares insights on resilience, meaning and flourishing in the face of challenges.

As a digital communications professional in healthcare, Dillon collaborates with leaders and experts across her organization, translating complex ideas into clear, impactful and actionable communication for staff and physicians. She also serves in the Presbyterian Church in Canada as an ordained elder and a contributing member of the Committee on Church Doctrine, bringing both faith and practice into her work. You can find her article on the ethical use of artificial intelligence (AI) in the church on page 38 of the Winter edition of the Presbyterian Connection newspaper.

As a public speaker, Dillon addresses themes of flourishing, resilience and the unexpected strength found in adversity, drawing deeply from her own experience with chronic health conditions.

She makes her home in Lethbridge, Alberta with her husband, two dogs and a cat – plus regular visits from two grand-puppies! She loves books and food but says her real specialty is creating routines, tools and processes that let her contribute fully to those around her, sometimes despite, and sometimes because of, her limitations.
